

Why isn't this the Oppenheimer Museum?

This photograph shows science leaders in a meeting during the Manhattan project. J. Robert Oppenheimer stands out in the center, but the gentleman in the foreground is Dr. Norris Bradbury. After WWII, Oppie left Los Alamos, and Bradbury took over. He would serve as Lab Director for 25 years. He put the lab on firm footing during times of great uncertainty, and was in charge when the first collections of historical artifacts were made which would become this museum. Dr. Bradbury and his wife, Lois, are fondly remembered by many who knew them. He was not related closely to Ray Bradbury.
